BERTIE BIRD'S

"UNUSUAL BREAKFAST"

Perching on the pretty yellow head of a sunflower, one bright autumn morning, Bertie Bird sang for his breakfast. While singing, he kept his bright little eyes glued to the kitchen door of a small red house nearby. "Come on out!" he called to Tommy, the little boy of the house. "Bring me my toast crumb!"

But something was wrong! Tommy did not appear.

"My goodness!" chirped Bertie, perplexed. "Where could he be?"

Deciding to find out, he flew down and lit upon the edge of a flower pot, which stood on the kitchen window sill.

"Chirp! Chirp!" he called loudly.

There was no answer. Leaning over, he cocked his head to one side and peered through the window. The kitchen was empty!

"ChirEE! ChirEE!" he screamed at the top of his lungs. As he pecked sharply on the window pane, there was still no answer.

"It's no use," he sighed. "Tommy has forgotten about me this morning."

Poor Bertie felt very sad and puzzled. And pretty hungry, too. "Guess I'll have to scurry around and find my own breakfast!"

Spreading his wings, he was about to fly away, when, suddenly, the kitchen door banged open and out rushed Tommy.

"Chee! Chee!" trilled Bertie. "I'm going to get my crumbs after all!"

Carrying a large paper bag and a camera, the little boy and his excited dog raced across the yard without giving Bertie a glance.

"Hey, Tommy!" called Bertie. "Have you forgotten my bread crumbs?"

If Tommy heard the little bird's anxious chirping, he paid no attention. Bertie was amazed. "How can he treat me this way?" he cried. "After I sang all my prettiest songs for him!"

By this time, Tommy had reached the fence. "Sorry, Rex!" he said, stopping and turning toward his dog. "But I can't take you with me this time! Go back to the house! Go on, boy!"

Whining miserably, the dog trotted slowly back across the yard. Then his young master vaulted over the fence and headed for the orchard.

"Now, why did he do that?" Bertie asked himself. "He's never gone anywhere without his dog before!"

Filled with curiosity, Bertie decided to follow him to see what he was up to. Zooming up over the fence, he was soon circling around over Tommy's head.

"Chirrup! Chirree!" he called loudly.

Glancing up, Tommy noticed Bertie and grinned. "Hi, little Blue Bird! Are you scolding me for forgetting your crumbs this morning? Sorry, pal! It won't happen again!"

Bertie was overjoyed—Tommy had noticed him at last. Making their way over fields and meadows to the wooded hills, Bertie chirped and chattered, telling the boy how happy he was. And Tommy whistled and talked to him to show that he understood.

But the minute they entered the woods, Tommy seemed to forget about Bertie. Hurrying to a beautiful old oak tree, he squatted down beneath it.

"My goodness!" chirped Bertie, alighting on a branch directly over the boy. "What's he going to do now?"

Opening the paper bag, Tommy took out a head of lettuce, tore off the leaves and scattered them around on the ground. Next, he emptied a small bag of shelled peanuts in a pile close to the trunk of the tree. Then, picking up his camera, Tommy whistled softly and leaped behind the tree.

"What strange behavior!" Bertie chirped, craning his neck to see where his little friend had gone.

Suddenly, as though by magic, three little cottontails popped up out of the underbrush and hopped cautiously toward the lettuce. Then, swoosh!—two chattering squirrels scampered past him. Bertie was so startled, he almost fell off the branch. "What's going on around here, anyway?" he cried.

While the squirrels quickly gathered up the peanuts and the cottontails happily nibbled the lettuce leaves, Bertie flew around the tree to a branch directly above his little friend. But Tommy was much too busy squinting through the finder of his camera and taking pictures of the feeding animals, to see Bertie.

Bertie trembled with fright, for he had never seen a camera before. But he did know about hunters with guns!

"Oh, dear!" he cried. "He's going to shoot the poor little squirrels and cottontails! I must STOP him!"

Flying quickly to the animals, Bertie fluttered over them squawking and screeching. Quick as a flash, the animals, who understood Bertie's warning, disappeared.

"You little imp!" laughed Tommy, coming out from behind the tree. "What did you do that for?"

"Chiree! Chee! Chee!" scolded Bertie from the tree.

"Oh!" answered his friend. "So that's how it is! Paying me back for forgetting your crumbs this morning! Well, I'll take care of THAT right now!"

Reaching into the paper bag, Tommy brought out a flat-full of toast crumbs and scattered them around on the ground.

"At last!" cried Bertie. "My breakfast!"

Then, as Bertie and a flock of woodland birds nibbled the crumbs, Tommy stood quietly nearby and took pictures of them.

This time, however, Bertie did not cry out a warning. He was too busy trying to keep the other birds from eating all his crumbs!
